OUTLOOK & REVIEW

The market turbulence from the previous month was carried over into May. Much of the elements outlined in our April report remain in place: inflationary pressures, unsettled geopolitical environment, constraining monetary policy to name but a few.

To add to this, the first signs of slowing US activity are starting to appear on the economic radar.

In sum, the financial and economic situation remains unclear which is unsettling for most asset classes.

In the subordinated bond space, spreads continued to widen offering up assets with yields knocking on a 2-figure handle. These levels are looking exceedingly generous compared to historical norms.

Market participants are hoping for more stable conditions in the future, with a greater certainty on the actual Federal Reserve monetary policy roll out. So far, all we have to contend with for the last 9 months is talk and more talk...

Our defensive opportunist approach has not changed. Our focus remains on quality assets with a strong carry and capital gain potential while holding an important reinvestment option for a more aggressive positioning once present-day uncertainties dissipate.
